

interviewer: So already, how do you want us to call your spouse during the interview?

interviewee: (partner).

interviewer: (partner), ok. And so, how long have you been... interviewee: It has been [16-20] years.

interviewer: [16-20] years, ok. I would like you to tell me a little about your story, what you are currently experiencing, how it started.

interviewee: So, it started, we met when we were in high school. So I was in senior year, he was in [year] and so we met through friends of friends. There you go. And the beginnings were a bit complicated because we were young and then there were departures for higher studies where suddenly we also experienced a long-distance relationship. Because the first year we were not in the same city. There you go, so ups and downs. And now it's been [16-20] years, so we have two children. We've been married since [Year]. There you go, so what else can I say? So it's a bit particular for us because we have, let's say, a daily life that is different from most people because in fact he regularly goes to [Job]. So he is not a [related job], he has a sedentary status, which means he does not have the status of a [related job] and so in fact he works in [Job Title]. So what happens is he leaves, he has missions actually during the year. So overall, one third of the year he is at [Job]. So obviously we have, us too, I think that it plays a lot in our relationship, but this habit of having moments where we will find each other, leave each other, live at a distance. And that, it also has greatly strengthened, let's say, our bond. There you go, because it's good too to experience absence and to experience missing. So there you go, it's rather something positive for us now, which may have been complicated, but which is also positive. There you go, what else to say? Well, it's, there you go, it's a relationship that, for me, is very important. It's the most important person in my life. There you go, and after that there are my children, but so... We also communicate very easily. Obviously, as we have experienced ups and downs, there you go, it's been a very long time. We didn't grow up together, but there you go, in parallel, let's say obviously, as we met young. So what makes us, there you go, learned to communicate a lot and realize how important it was to be able to say things. And so we know each other well, but we are still discovering each other. There you go.

interviewer: Yes, so you started young, therefore, very young, at a distance. Then, it evolved, let's say, naturally, little by little, without really... Did you start living together?

interviewee: So not right away, indeed. So, we met in high school, so each at our parents' house. I went to higher studies in [City A]. He stayed, he still had [1-5] year to do in high school. So he stayed living at his parents' house. So that year was a bit more complicated. So there you go, we were together when I came home, but when I left, we were not really together anymore. It was a bit complicated. And then after that, we found ourselves in the same city to do our studies, so for [1-5] years. But we had chosen not to have the same apartment, that is to say not to live together. I told him, it is important that you live alone, that you have your autonomy. I don't want us to move in together and depend on each other. It is important that each of us has our daily life. Well, learning to live alone seemed important to me. So we did it for [1-5] years. And the last year of my bachelor's degree, his training, we had taken an apartment. But actually, he had a professional contract that he left. And then, once I got my bachelor's degree, I went on to get a master's degree. And suddenly, there, on the other hand, I was in [City A] and we were at a distance. And he started working like that, going to [Job]. What means that in fact, concretely, we have never been together all the time. But that is to say that after my master's, in any case after my studies, we quickly realized that anyway, it was clear to us that we were going to stay together. It was really a project that we had built. The fact really, I think, of living at a distance allowed us to realize that it was a relationship that was very important to us. And that we saw ourselves building our life together. That was really, I think, at the end of our studies. So it had already been [1-5] years, more than [1-5] years, even [6-10] years that we had known each other.

interviewer: OK. And then you lived together, still at a distance. It has never been...

interviewee: Yes, from the start. That's it. This job, it's his first job. And therefore, indeed, he always left regularly, [1-5] weeks, [1-5] month, [1-5] and a half months at most. They are never too long periods either. But in fact, we have always been accustomed to this rhythm in our story. That's for sure.

interviewer: OK. Used to leaving each other, finding each other. And then, the children?

interviewee: And then, the children. First, we lived quite a lot just the two of us too. That was important. Well, without children, for several years. So, it was important for me to be married before having children. For him, it wasn't necessarily his project. But for me, it was important. It was already making a family, just the two of us, before having children. And therefore, very soon after the marriage, the child project came. And therefore, [1-5] year, [1-5] and a half years after our marriage, we had our first son. And then a second, there you go, [1-5] and a half years later. Afterwards, there you go. To make a family, we stop there. It's already good.

interviewer: If you had to compare the relationship you have with (partner) to the one your friends have with their spouse, what would you say?

interviewee: I am quite proud of our couple. I realize that we necessarily had to go through these departures because in our circle, anyway, we don't have friends who live similar situations. It was more the case in where we could be in contact with possibly sailors. But now, we have moved. It's true that in our circle of friends or in our friends that we have had for a long time, our youth friends that we have kept, who have known us from the beginning, it's true that we see that we have a somewhat different relationship because of the fact of leaving each other, finding each other. But anyway, I know that often, people tell us, it's funny, we have the impression that you are... You show, we are quite demonstrative towards each other. And some friends' couples who have been together for a long time are much less demonstrative. I know that for us, it's something that we do very naturally. So often, we get feedback. I have already had people tell me, it's funny, it seems like you have been together for [1-5] years, like it's the beginning, whereas it's been [16-20] years. And it's true that among our friends, anyway, we are the ones who have been together the longest. I have the impression, anyway, that in the eyes of others, they rather think that they are still in love. It's not like for some couples where sometimes, there can be less demonstrations.

interviewer: Yes, and the absence also creates necessarily reunions.

interviewee: That's it, yes. There you go.

interviewer: And if you had to compare it to your previous relationships?

interviewee: I had few, necessarily. As we met young, I had very few. He is really my first love, necessarily. So my boyfriends before, it wasn't serious. It was very young, stories where we don't project ourselves at all in the same way. I quickly realized that there was a very strong bond between us. And the fact of being able to easily confide in him, feeling that (partner) was there for me, no matter what, and that I could turn to him, it was kind. Whereas the relationships I could have before, it was more what does he think, where I didn't really know, necessarily. More afraid of the image I could project, which is not the case now. When I say the image I can project, it's this idea of paying a little attention to how we are, being more concerned about what the other person will think, whereas I know he takes me as I am, I don't know how to hide my faults, I don't try to show certain things.

interviewer: You mentioned earlier communication, you have a lot of communication, a strong bond. I would like you to tell me for you, what is a high-quality relationship, how would you define it?

interviewee: I think that seeing couples, anyway because I am at an age where I have friends who separate, and I often ask myself what makes a couple last or not last, this idea of high quality. And I really think that the ability to say things, to be able to communicate, to share emotions, feelings, without fear of being judged or being confident to do so, because it is not something that is necessarily easy. And then being able to also say the things that are not going well, because necessarily everything cannot always be rosy, there are necessarily things that annoy us, that irritate us. It's being able to say it without judgment, without hurting the other. So it requires all the time precisely because nothing is ever acquired either. So I think that yes, being able to communicate already about emotions, saying what you said there, I don't like it, it hurts me. Being able to communicate about what we can feel, it seems essential to me. It's true that in raising children, there is still a lot of need to be quite in agreement too, because it's true that I find that a couple is still quite disrupted by it, it shakes things up quite a lot. And so you have to be able to communicate about that too, and be quite in line with what we expect in the education of our children. I can see that it can play, anyway in some couples around me, when they do not agree, it necessarily impacts the couple. And then I think we also... We are very aware that it is our couple that is the base of our family, and that we have our children, but that we are not just a father or just a mother, and that we also have our couple, that we need to nourish, as much as we need to nourish our children. We also need time for ourselves, to find each other. And that is true, those are things that we can easily forget, forget in our role as a parent. So we are quite aware of really needing time for us, just the two of us, and being able to find each other. So that makes our couple of high quality. There you go.

interviewer: Communication and then giving time to the couple. And a permanent adaptability in relation to all that.

interviewee: Yes, that's it. For me, there is still a lot of need for kindness too. I feel that sometimes people can think there is malice behind a gesture or a remark. And from there, it's off to a bad start. We can be hurt by gestures, words, but it's important to say to ourselves that the other, it's not the intention. If the intention is to hurt the other, you really need to ask questions. But generally, it's often misunderstandings. And we don't necessarily realize that we do something that can be really annoying for the other. And so it's the importance of realizing too, well there, maybe I need to readjust, adapt. That's essential. Wanting to do good and do things well. And also telling ourselves that the other, their intention is not to be malicious either.

interviewer: And how do you know you are in a relationship where there is communication, adaptability? How do we spot a relationship?

interviewee: So we, we communicate in writing. Because necessarily, at a distance, we will communicate in writing. So there are things we can also more easily say. Well, I know for me, there are more difficulties sometimes in being able to say things where my husband is very comfortable, to share his emotions, show me or explain to me, or give me words of love, much more comfortable than me, where for me it is more difficult. In any case, for me, it is less natural. So suddenly, we can write. There are things we also say in writing that we would not necessarily say if we had an oral discussion. That's also a plus, related to the distance we live when he goes to [Job]. And then, it's a lot of time we take to talk. And then not just to talk about what we did at work, but to talk about us, to talk about our children, to talk about the future. So we will, on a day when we will find each other, we will communicate a lot, actually. And then, if there is... That is to say, I have friends' couples who sulk. That's something I don't understand. That, I don't understand, because for me, if there is something wrong, we say it, actually. Or if at the moment, we are really annoyed, we cannot say it right away, it will be some time after. But for me, it's impossible to sulk for [1-5] days, [1-5] week, without talking to show the other that we are not happy. That, I don't understand, we don't do it, between us. We can be angry during the day, but in that case, in the evening, we will talk about it. There will be little time between the moment when something went wrong and the moment when we will talk about it, actually.

interviewer: Yes, quickly burst the abscess.

interviewee: Burst the abscess very quickly. And if the other, well, if I am not well, he will very quickly come towards me and tell me there is something wrong. And vice versa, I will also feel, well, there, there is a need for us to talk about it.

interviewer: When would you say your relationship was the most qualitative in these last [16-20] years?

interviewee: Wow! The most qualitative? I think it is almost now, actually. Well, more and more qualitative, maybe, I don't know, but it's seeing the years pass and still discovering each other, and always learning about the other, learning about yourself. So it's true that... And then with the children, it's true that it brings something else. So yes, I would say it's almost now that it's the most qualitative. After, there are obviously happier days than others, but I find that yes, we are rather... Yes, we are well. We have necessarily experienced difficult things that have brought us closer too. He lost his dad. For me, it was complicated for the birth of the second. I started a small postpartum depression. And it's true that suddenly, all this brings us closer too. So yes, these last few years, our children are small. Yes, it's true that we are well.

interviewer: And is there a period that was significant in the sense that it was the least qualitative for you?

interviewee: The [year]. The [year], it's true that it's crazy to say that we started like that. But the [year] for me, was very difficult. Well, for him too. But suddenly, we talked less, I think, at that time. So...

interviewer: ... ..

interviewee: We were talking about the [year], complicated.

interviewee: There you go. I think it was the most difficult year because we hurt each other. Because it was a bit... "You left me, so I'm going to see someone else." It was a bit painful. But since we started like that, afterwards, it was fine. ... So, suddenly, we talked about communication, we talked about adaptability, taking time for oneself.

interviewer: Apart from these things, are there other things that are very important to you in a romantic relationship?

interviewee: So, it's more peripheral. Afterwards, in fact, communication, for me, results... There are many things that will... The fact of having time for oneself too, it implies that we can nourish each other, so being clear about the needs of the other. That is to say the need for affectionate gestures, loving words. So that, yes, it's still important, all that. But it results from giving time for oneself and then communicating well for me. And after that, I would say that, really, more peripherally, but there is still in the family. After all, I think managing to make things go well also with the family of the partner seems to me to have a lot of influence on the couple. For us, it goes very well. He is very well integrated into my family. It has always gone very well with my parents, me too with his family, with his brothers, then with my brothers. And it is part of the things that are also important for us. I think it would have been more complicated for me to be with someone with whom it did not go at all with my family. So I think it can still greatly influence a couple, to have someone with whom it does not match with their relatives. And since we are both quite family-oriented, it would have been complicated, I think, if we hadn't had someone with whom it went well with our families. What else? Projects too, of course. Being able to project, making projects together. It seems important to me, whether it be projects of... We bought a house, we did work in it. But that too can shake a couple, because after all, doing work can be a bit complicated. But it also brings it together, because it is a project that we build together. And so, it's also what we want for the future. It is supporting each other, in fact. Supporting each other both. I have a project, I want us to do this, and the other one follows us. It is also being supportive of each other, in the projects, in what... Supporting each other, that's it. So I wanted to do additional training. And being able to say, OK, go ahead, I give you time, we arrange for the daily life to allow you to do it. That, it also seems very important to me. There you go, supporting the other in their projects. The same goes for... That's true, it's important. There are the children, the family, there is the couple. But it's true that there is also, individually, activities for him. And that too, it is something that... I have more difficulty doing it, but he, I know it is a need, and that he has activities for himself. And so, it is managing to support, in fact, that he takes time for his activities. So there you go, he is a great sportsman, he does a lot of things, so he can be away sometimes on weekends. And me, it is supporting him in that. That is to say that I will have friends, for example, who are fusionals and who will have trouble supporting that the other does things without the partner. Where, for me, it seems important that we each have time for ourselves. I have more difficulty doing it, but he will always push me, tell me... But yes, take time for yourself, go do this, go do that. So if I want to have a girls' night, see my girlfriends, etc., it will never be guilt-inducing words, telling me... I would like you to stay with me, or one. It's always... Well, no, you need it, go ahead. And that also seems important to me to support the other in what they need and to say that it's not just our couple, it's also you, individually, doing activities, doing things without me. So that's also important.

interviewer: OK. Based on what you have experienced with (partner) mostly, I would like you to tell me what love is for you.

interviewee: It can be love in the couple, in friendship, in the family?

interviewer: As you feel it.

interviewee: What is love? For me, it is a very strong bond that makes us attached. There is this idea of attachment. So indeed, the first bonds of love are our friends, our parents. And it is wanting the good of others, being impacted when people are not well. I try to find things that are common denominators for all our relatives, all the people we love. Wanting to spend time with these people, to share things, to worry about them. Wanting to spoil them, to give them things too. Being present when things are not going well, being present also in moments when everything is fine. Rejoicing in the happiness of the people we love. So, love is all that. Being impacted when they are well, as when they are not well. And then, it is also bonds, people who know us well, whom we know well. That's it, the idea is trying to... Not necessarily define love in a couple.

interviewer: It's as you want. Sometimes it is simpler to start with friendship, but it can be in the couple too.

interviewee: Friendship, yes. Yes, well, I know that with my friends, but really, the real friends, we can very well not give news for a long time. If we see each other or if we give news, we will always be very happy, and it is as if we had seen each other the day before. It is not necessarily people with whom I will have news every day all the time, or that I will see very, very regularly. It is people I can not see for a very long time, but when I see them, I tell myself that it is really very good. It is people I can not see for a very long time, but when I see them, it is really strong bonds that are strong, but it is not related to the fact that we see each other a lot or often that makes the bond strong. Which can be a bit the same with (partner), ultimately. Yes, that's it. And even with my family, we are not necessarily... My brothers do not live near me either. So there you go. Anyway, I don't need that. That is a difference, actually, of... I know that my friends, I don't necessarily need to see them a lot all the time for the bond to be there. Where I know that for (partner), it is more complicated that his friends do not necessarily look to see each other. Well, there you go. They want to live differently, anyway, friendship than me.

interviewer: Friendship, OK. And compared to love, do you live it the same way?

interviewee: Yes, I think. Yes, I think, yes.

interviewer: And you would say what importance love has in a romantic relationship?

interviewee: In a romantic relationship? It is fundamental. It is fundamental. And then, love, I think it is a lot about wanting the good of the other too. It is not loving someone just for what they bring us. It is also for what we can bring them. And feeling good because we take care of the other too. It is not just waiting for the other to take care of us. For me, there is a lot of that. I think there is really this idea of being happy that the other is happy. It is not in the sense of, it is not in the sense of... Yeah.

interviewer: We know that there are different ways to love, as we said earlier. How do you know that (partner) loves you?

interviewee: Because he tells me already. Because he tells me, because I... Through daily life, tenderness, also gestures. We talk about the language of love. I think that for us, tender gestures are important. Loving words too. There is also taking care of the other. Daily things that will make it taking care of you. So, yes, mainly that.

interviewer: The little attentions.

interviewee: The little attentions, that's it.

interviewer: So, we also talked about the fact that sometimes there can be ups and downs. I would like you to tell me about one of the last negative interactions you had.

interviewee: Oof, I'll have to think. So, negative in the sense that... I'll take an example rather where it was negative for him. Or rather, it disturbed him a bit... not disturbed, but it was complicated to hear. Things I could have brought up to him, related to our relationship. Because indeed, we don't have quite the same needs. Which is normal. And suddenly, it was... Well, that is to say that I can quickly be absorbed by daily life, household chores, and therefore be less available for him. And so, it can sometimes be more complicated for him to live. Where I, as I am caught in my daily life, I am less also to take the time to say how you feel. And there you go, you may also need a moment of tenderness. And being able to listen to my needs, it is more difficult for me. I will easily prioritize the well-being of the children, the well-being of everyone, before thinking about my well-being. It is my way of functioning. Where he, it is true that he will be more in tune with his needs. And so, there was a moment where we exchanged because he made me understand that it was complicated, that we didn't give enough time for us, precisely. And suddenly, it was being able to explain to him that we didn't necessarily have the same needs. And I think I had words that, at that moment, were more difficult for him to hear. And that he could, afterwards, tell me that it was complicated to hear that. I would say that it's maybe the last moment a bit more negative. If I think of the last time, anyway.

interviewer: And it was resolved, then, with communication?

interviewee: Yes, that's it. The fact of talking about it again, even if at the moment, it may have been a bit difficult for him to hear. Afterwards, we talked about it again and so it was better. And even, it ended up bringing us closer again, ultimately.

interviewer: And one of the last positive interactions you had?

interviewee: Well, he came back from [Job]. It's been not even a week, so necessarily, as soon as he comes back, it's always very positive.

interviewer: Could you say that you have challenges to face on a daily basis, in your relationship?

interviewee: Yes. For me, you have to start from the principle that nothing is acquired in a couple. Even if it's been [16-20]years that we are together, even if we are married, even if we have two children, it does not mean that we must let ourselves think that everything is won. I think it's always a challenge. I think that after, it's all these little stresses of life that can come a bit to disturb a couple. So there you go, the fact of doing work. So there, our house, it is not finished, there are still work to do. So each time, it is managing to agree on what we want, listening to the other, listening to oneself, to manage to find by common agreement, what will suit us best to both of us. So that, it's permanent challenges. The other moments of stress that can be in our adult lives, it just takes gestures... Fortunately, everything is fine otherwise, apart from that. Our relatives are fine, us too. But all these stresses that we can experience are for me things that can easily impact a couple.

interviewer: Are there challenges that you have already faced that can be significant?

interviewee: The fact of living at a distance, for me, it's a big challenge. Our studies at a distance, it was a challenge to manage to stay close. After that, I talked about it a bit. There was indeed the death of his dad, which was complicated. The same, you have to manage to be present for the other. So that, it's also challenges to face. And then the birth of the children, for me, it's... Our biggest challenges, it was that, I think, it's becoming a parent. And especially the second time. It was even more difficult with our second, because there was already another child. It reorganized a lot of things. So for me, it was complicated. I experienced difficult moments. And that he could be there, present, supportive, it was really very important.

interviewer: And apart from the challenges or negative interactions, you told me earlier, we don't sulk. But are there more important conflicts?

interviewee: Never on... Never on fundamental things. The last time we got a bit angry, let's say it like that, when we got a bit angry, it was about the work, on things for which we were not necessarily going to agree. So, the tone can rise and we can be in conflict. But for me, it's not things... Well, it's not conflicts about the children or the family or things that can be much more impactful. There, it's just about finding a common agreement for... What was it about, anyway? It must have been about the stairs, anyway. But there you go, it happens to us to raise the tone, to get angry possibly. And so yes, it's happening after, that the pressure goes down. But it never lasts very long. And they are not subjects that are vital. That's it, fundamental.

interviewer: And the resolution of these conflicts, it is done...

interviewee: Generally, I cry. There you go. And then, it... There is, I don't know how to say, but I think there can be anger, anger that arises. We can have difficulty hearing the anger of the other. But generally, there is always empathy that makes us say that okay, I crossed the line, or it was not appropriate, or we will apologize, forgive each other. That's it, I think, it is being able to recognize one's wrongs too. It's true that managing to be able to apologize, to ask for forgiveness, it is done very naturally too for us. It can happen that, emotionally, it overflows, and we will always be able to go towards the other and say I am really sorry, there, it was not appropriate. And being able to question oneself. There you go, questioning oneself.

interviewer: Are there other means than those we have already addressed that allow you to maintain your relationship?

interviewee: I'm thinking... I don't see. There surely are others. There, I don't see.

interviewer: Would you say that this relationship is good for you?

interviewee: Yes, very important, essential. It's really the most important person for me. Even if it is not fusion. That's also where sometimes I tell myself, if I look at the couples around me, I can live without him. But he is the most important person in my life. I don't know if... That is to say, if he is my best friend, if something goes wrong, it's necessarily towards him that I will turn. He is the person who knows me best, to whom I can easily confide. And vice versa, I know it's the same for him. And at the same time, it's not a fusion that makes us forget ourselves, individually.

interviewer: Yes, you can live separately, but there needs to be a psychic presence?

interviewee: It's not necessarily a psychic presence. You help each other reach your goals.

interviewer: I suppose the answer, but I would like to know if you think you are the same person as before the relationship. And how this relationship has changed you.

interviewee: Necessarily a lot, a lot influenced. I think my husband would say that it is I who had more influence on him. But I think it's as much. Because indeed, already we met very young. But necessarily, discovering that there are other parental models than the one we have known, it still plays a lot. Because necessarily, as a couple, I am part of his family, he is part of my family. It's the same for so many years. It's true that there is both his influence, but there is also the influence of his family, which plays a lot too on who we can be. So necessarily, I am not at all the same person. He taught me to have more confidence in myself, to be able to communicate more, to say things. It's funny because indeed, me in my family, we are all very close, but we have difficulty saying things to each other. We can talk about a lot of things, but the essential things, saying that we love each other, are things that are complicated. Where, with my husband, he really taught me this aspect, that it was not dangerous to tell others that we loved them. That has changed a lot. And then yes, necessarily, we give him a lot of strength.

interviewer: And regarding (partner), do you think it has changed him?

interviewee: Yes, a lot too. It's maybe easier for me to realize it than for myself. But of course, he is not at all the same. He has changed a lot since we met, in a good way. Positively, obviously. Especially professionally too. I know that our exchanges help him a lot to take a step back, to position himself differently at work, because these are sometimes things that have been a bit more complicated for him. Regarding the children, I know he tells me a lot... I am very attentive to the education we can give to our children, and so I inform myself a lot about many things. And so I will tell him, well, on so many things, we should rather try to do it this way, this way. And it's true that he will often tell me that it allows him to really have another perspective than what he knew. It plays a lot at the level, I would not say education, but the fact of having other parental models and other sources at the level of family construction, more than personally. Yes, taking a step back in relation to our families, quite a lot. And then personally, yes, surely, but I may have fewer examples that come to mind.

interviewer: Do you feel safe in this relationship?

interviewee: Yes, very. Very safe. It's very important for me. Justly, there you go, the person I feel safest with, that's for sure.

interviewer: It's the pillar person, if I can...

interviewee: The pillar, exactly.

interviewer: Now, I would like to address an important dimension in couples too, which is sexuality. What place does it have for you in your couple?

interviewee: It is quite fundamental. For us, it reflects a lot the state, how our couple is doing. Yes, it is a lot the image of our couple. And for us, it seems quite inconceivable that there is no sexuality. So it is really quite fundamental, really. After, hence the importance of always keeping communication at this level. So it's true that there too, we communicate a lot to know what the other wants, what the other needs. And so it's very fulfilling.

interviewer: Would you say you are satisfied with your sex life?

interviewee: Yes, very.

interviewer: And currently, what is the frequency of your intercourse?

interviewee: Because of the children, the daily life, we are at once or twice a week.

interviewer: I just have for finishing some small scales on overall satisfaction. From 1 to 9, totally true.

interviewee: I don't see however, it's all black.

interviewer: So wait. It's weird. There you go. Ah yes, they don't want me to show you the table. Great. If I read them to you, is that okay?

interviewee: Yes, we'll try like that. If necessary, I'll take notes.

interviewer: From 1 to 9. From 1 not at all true to 9 totally true. If I ask you, in general, does your partner really listen to you?

interviewee: 8.

interviewer: Why 8?

interviewee: Because it is part of the things that are very important to him. To pay attention to me.

interviewer: And why not 9?

interviewee: And why not 9? Because I think we can't always achieve perfection.

interviewer: The second one, it's always from 1 to 9, not at all true to totally true. My partner is generally attentive to my needs.

interviewee: But it's not the same question?

interviewer: No, the first one is my partner really listens to me. And the second, he is attentive to my needs.

interviewee: Ah yes, okay. Ah yes. Well, I would say 7 then.

interviewer: 7, okay. A little less than the first one then?

interviewee: Yeah yeah.

interviewer: Why?

interviewee: Because if I don't express my needs, it is more difficult for him to realize. So really, I can express my needs. But indeed, if I don't express them, it is more difficult.

interviewer: Okay. Then, how satisfied are you with your relationship? So we have completely dissatisfied, very dissatisfied, rather dissatisfied, neutral. Rather satisfied, very satisfied and completely satisfied.

interviewee: There we are talking about the sexual relationship?

interviewer: No, romantic relationship.

interviewee: Romantic, okay. Well, I would say very satisfied. Because there, there are always things that can be improved.

interviewer: Okay. And overall, from 0 to 10, 0 not at all satisfied or 10 completely satisfied, what score would you give for your satisfaction in your couple relationship?

interviewer: 8, okay. And why not 9, why not 7?

interviewee: Why not 9? Because there too, there are always things to improve. But it's still very good.

interviewer: Okay. Well, great. For me, it's all good.
