

Speaker 1 [00:00:02]: So, is there a name, a word you would like to use to refer to your companion, girlfriend, partner, spouse? Is there a word you are more comfortable with?

Speaker 2 [00:00:15]: A word? Is that a mandatory question?

Speaker 1 [00:00:19]: We prefer it. It can be her first name if you prefer, no problem.

Speaker 2 [00:00:27]: Ah, to refer to her during the meeting? Well, [partner].

Speaker 1 [00:00:33]: [Partner], very well. How long have you been with [partner]?

Speaker 2 [00:00:38]: It's been about [1-5] years, [1-5] and a half years. Actually - I don't know if I can speak freely like this - but I will, without question. It fits well because you talk about relational quality, it fits well because it's a topic that fascinates me and that's why I was immediately interested in this process, because in my past, I've had various relationships. I had a relationship with the mother of my children. I wasn't really myself, let's say, not really constructed in terms of identity. But I've always loved psychology, spirituality, personal evolution. And the "One to One" relationship. But actually, as time went on, especially with [partner], I really started to think about it more and realized that we are both good and bad, everyone has both negative and positive aspects in their behavior, and that the ideal goal of a couple is to be as sincere as possible. But in all that we are, especially our bad sides, so we can be loved for who we are, not just parts of us. And I believe that the truly constructive relationship, and I mentioned spirituality because for me, it's a powerful love that is really about being transparent with ourselves and with each other, even if it hurts. We say everything. And we are everything we are. And then, we have trust. I'm very much into seduction, and I actually want to do a lot of things in my relationship, and in the long term, I also want to broaden things. And that's typical, but I've talked about it from the beginning with [partner]. At the start, I wasn't looking to settle down at all, I was in a fluttering mode. And over time, I realized I didn't need to be alone, I needed to be with her. But I think we can bring a lot of additional things to our foundation. Many more things. That's really what interests me, the foundation of a relationship where with the other, we are friends, lovers, confidants. We are everything. We are complete beings with whom we are 100% ourselves, and it's not easy.

Speaker 1 [00:03:23]: Yes, you say a friend, a lover, a love as well. It's important to have all these facets for you in the relationship.

Speaker 2 [00:03:32]: Yes, but I think if you're going to have a relationship, it has to be ultra-transcendent. It has to be powerful so that we can be completely honest. To say "I'm a jerk in certain circumstances, I did something awful because it's my ego, it's how I operate." And apologize a lot too, I've learned to do that. Yes, I messed up, I apologize. What can we do? Conflict management is also important and interests me. But yes, really being able to share everything. We are not the same person, but sharing as much as possible seems necessary to me. Otherwise, for me, it's not worth having a story.

Speaker 1 [00:04:32]: So, if I understand what you're saying, this idea of being both lovers, friends, and romantic partners is really about sincerity with the other, being oneself.

Speaker 2 [00:04:44]: Yes, it's about sincerity. We talk a lot about it with [partner], but I want to experiment with a lot of things, I want us to have fun. It's true that as a couple, we made the choice not to live together, it's complicated geographically, but really to see each other very little with the kids or other people. We do it more and more, but I'm naturally a bit of a loner, so it suits me, but I still like people. But we want to keep this universe where we've already had children, a family. But when we're together, it's like we're a young or an old retired couple without children, we are both. We create our own world, we share many passions, we go picking, we're in nature, we make music, we do many things. We have many values in common, and it's a cocoon that I think is important to preserve and that is usually lost when you start a family. Because the dynamics change, there's a child that takes all the space, and the couple gets lost. Then, whether it's found again or not depends. It always depends on what we want. I tell [partner] if we want to be together and be 100% ourselves, we will be together. If we feel it's not right, that it starts to go wrong, that it doesn't suit us anymore, then we say we need to part ways and do something else. But we must not lose ourselves.

Speaker 1 [00:06:48]: What do you mean when you say not to lose oneself?

Speaker 2 [00:06:54]: I'm referring to my past, surely. I think it's hard in a couple not to lose oneself. Our deep desires, as individuals, it's actually a question of selfishness. To say what are my needs. Okay, over time, we evolve, we become more alike. We take habits because there's the phase where we take habits, small things. We start giving little names, then we start to reproach each other and adapt to the other. Yes, I've often lost myself because I didn't know how to assert my identity with strong-willed women. And today, I think it's true for everyone, it's essential not to lose oneself, always saying no, I'm drifting away from myself. Then in [1-5] years, I'll lose it because I realize the efforts I'm making are not measured by who I am.

Speaker 1 [00:08:08]: If I understand well, this idea of losing oneself means not forgetting oneself in the couple, not forgetting oneself.

Speaker 2 [00:08:15]: Yes, that's it.

Speaker 1 [00:08:18]: Keeping a whole place in the couple as a person, with one's desires, needs.

Speaker 2 [00:08:29]: Yes, and accepting what we've endured, what we really want to do. Yes.

Speaker 1 [00:08:35]: You talked about relationships being transcendent. I'd like you to tell me more about what that means for you.

Speaker 2 [00:08:49]: It's more about feelings or symbolism. It's hard to explain, but for me, it's linked to being truly ourselves. I can't explain it properly. But when we are truly ourselves, the pure essence, even daring to see our dark sides. When we are that with the other, we are connected in a way, there's trust, a huge love beyond "I love you, I miss you". It's a transcendental connection between beings. That's really what I seek, and I think [partner] understood that. We learned to see how the other works. But that's really what I'm looking for. And sure, we are different, I talk about having an open relationship, I think I'll get there one day. She thinks if I want an open relationship, if I have a relationship with another person, whether it's with her or not, if it's said or not, she thinks there's less love. For me, it's about this transcendent love, something I talk about as universal love since we've known each other. Universal love is loving enough to know who we are, what the couple is, and at no time, for me, it's the best way to have absolute trust in the other. We know they are happy, we know they are well, they tell the truth. And each one finds themselves in it. And in this dynamic, it must be reciprocal or each can do what they want and love being the entirety of themselves.

Speaker 1 [00:10:53]: Yes, if I understand well, there's this notion of acceptance of the other in the transcendence you describe.

Speaker 2 [00:11:01]: Yes, exactly. It's about accepting, accepting oneself and accepting the other in all that they are. Yes, that's it. And it's not easy.

Speaker 1 [00:11:08]: Because for you, it's two steps, accepting oneself, being sincere with oneself, and then presenting it sincerely to the other. And transcendence happens when we are accepted by the other, creating a union. Is that right?

Speaker 2 [00:11:26]: Yes, that's right. Because if we are not true to ourselves, which is already difficult for a human being, looking at oneself and saying I'm great here, I'm terrible there. Looking at our unconscious conditioned behavior by education, beliefs, all those things we are in denial about, don't want to see, looking at all that already requires a great step of self-analysis. And once we do that, not being in bad faith with ourselves or doing it with the other. And that's when it becomes really enjoyable.

Speaker 1 [00:12:08]: Transcendent, as you say.

Speaker 2 [00:12:09]: Exactly.

Speaker 1 [00:12:10]: Absolutely. You briefly mentioned your past relationships. If you were to compare the quality of the relationship you are currently experiencing with [partner] with your previous relationships, what would you say?

Speaker 2 [00:12:30]: The main thing is that my previous relationships were a reflection of me; they were hidden, shameful, non-authentic, over-adapted. The other didn't necessarily feel that way, they rather felt it as modesty because I am modest, introverted. But for me, it was over-adaptation due to education. And now, my discourse is conditioned by that. Since I left the mother of my children, I've had several relationships and I decided to be myself, to look within. And I realized I was lying to myself about what I liked, not what I was taught to like. With [partner], it was complicated at the start because I said I didn't want a relationship. She hung on, it was strong and fluid from the beginning. We started with regular get-togethers, and I'd say if it went well, we'd do it again. Just living in the present. And it's compared to my past relationships that I allowed myself to be sincere and straightforward. After a year, she reread our early conversations and realized it was tough, very tough initially. But I was always saying what I wanted, trying not to overdo it at the start as we usually do. Now, things are going well.

Speaker 1 [00:15:35]: So, if I understand correctly, you no longer wanted to make concessions at the beginning of your relationship with [partner], leading to very tough interactions.

Speaker 2 [00:15:58]: Yes, very tough, but I naturally adapt and am very gentle. Not tough in form but tough in substance. It's demanding.

Speaker 1 [00:16:24]: You've talked about your past relationships, can you compare your current relationship with [partner] to those of your friends?

Speaker 2 [00:16:54]: Ah, the relationships my friends have! I don't know the details, but there's always a hidden side, and then people separate and it's surprising. It often surprises people that we choose to stay just the two of us. We have a very precious, protected relationship. The long-term couples of my friends are naturally not like that. It's hard to generalize, but I think it takes effort to maintain this quality of relationship daily.

Speaker 1 [00:17:56]: You talked about a cocoon earlier. Is it something you would use to describe having this space just for you two?

Speaker 2 [00:18:10]: For us? Yes, yes.

Speaker 1 [00:18:13]: And you find in your friends' relationships that they sometimes fail or don't try to preserve this space for two.

Speaker 2 [00:18:32]: I think there's a comfort in thinking "it's secure". After a certain time, there's less seduction, less desire to seduce. I have a problem with that, I want a lot of openness, to try many things, explore. Whether in sex, new experiences, new passions, things to share. There are individual activities too. But I think couples share little. It's hard to say, each couple is so different. But it's easy to fall into the trap of thinking it's secure, not making efforts or making small ones. Then arguing without really questioning oneself. I think the key is being true to oneself. As I said earlier, if we are true to ourselves, we can't help but question ourselves. [Partner] once said, "I've never seen someone question themselves so quickly." Because of my past depression and doubts, it's like when you almost die, you realize you have nothing to lose. I have no problem questioning myself, acknowledging failure. The important thing is to evolve. In relationships, it's not about being right but being constructive. The smartest person is the one who says "you're right, I'm wrong", which encourages the other to acknowledge their faults too. Winning against the other feels bad, but losing and restoring dialogue is key.

Speaker 1 [00:22:04]: Making an effort to be constructive. If I understand correctly, you believe the root of relationship problems lies in not being true to oneself, leading to insincere interactions.

Speaker 2 [00:22:39]: Yes. Someone incomplete uses the couple to complete themselves, while someone complete uses it to enhance life. Less dependency, less fear, more unconditional love. Loving without conditions is the pinnacle, though difficult.

Speaker 1 [00:23:27]: Unconditional love means "I love you but..."

Speaker 2 [00:23:30]: Yes.

Speaker 1 [00:23:32]: "If you are not like this", "If you change", "If you match me better".

Speaker 2 [00:23:36]: Exactly.

Speaker 1 [00:23:37]: "I love you if..."

Speaker 2 [00:23:38]: Yes.

Speaker 1 [00:23:50]: You talked about what makes a high-quality relationship for you. Can you talk about what makes a low-quality relationship?

Speaker 2 [00:24:08]: For me, it's a relationship where everyone is in bad faith, not questioning themselves, failing to communicate. Communication is the foundation. Mediators, couples reformulating what was said, understanding each other's thoughts. Emotions aside, finding solutions. Communication is essential, yet difficult with affect. Bad couples argue, reproach, and fail to communicate.

Speaker 1 [00:31:50]: You mentioned communication. Can you talk more about its role in relationships?

Speaker 2 [00:32:08]: Over the years, I've realized how crucial communication is in a couple. For the other to know us perfectly, and for us to know ourselves. Avoiding old issues and taboos. [Partner] and I had issues with my ex. It was hard for her to accept that I see my ex once a week for the kids. But communication helped her understand there were no ambiguities, and it was necessary for me to see my kids. We also communicate a lot via messages, which I love because it allows for reflection and beautiful writing. It helps maintain a good conversation. Couples living together should write messages to each other, add little compliments. We realized we stopped doing that and decided to reintroduce it.

Speaker 1 [00:34:34]: You realized you weren't doing it anymore and decided to bring it back.

Speaker 2 [00:34:40]: Yes, I often felt the need for more communication. We argue sometimes, but we both want it to work and adjust accordingly.

Speaker 1 [00:35:14]: You adjust accordingly.

Speaker 2 [00:35:16]: Yes.

Speaker 1 [00:35:19]: You've talked about many things, high-quality and low-quality relationships. What are the most important things for you in a romantic relationship?

Speaker 2 [00:35:35]: Beyond what we've discussed, sex is very important. It's primal, beyond the couple, linked to our animal side. Communication in sex is crucial. With [partner], at the start, we had a normal relationship, then I wanted a power dynamic in sex. I sent her a questionnaire about her past, her desires, dislikes, everything. I think every couple should do this because we often assume things without communicating. Asking the right questions is key. Sex is a way to communicate and should be central.

Speaker 1 [00:38:38]: So, sex also serves a role of communication for you.

Speaker 2 [00:38:43]: Yes, it's a fundamental element. Communication in sex is crucial.

Speaker 1 [00:39:02]: What role does sex play in a couple for you?

Speaker 2 [00:39:08]: I see it as a fundamental aspect of human condition, often misused. It's a need, a pleasure linked to survival. It's important to put it at the center, not pretend, and ensure it's satisfying. Often, women neglect their sexuality, but it's essential to explore and play. Knowing each other's limits is crucial for a healthy sex life. Recently, we had a communication issue about seduction and limits, leading to a conflict. It was dramatic, but we worked through it with new conditions.

Speaker 1 [00:43:11]: You mentioned a recent conflict. Was it the last one?

Speaker 2 [00:43:19]: Yes.

Speaker 1 [00:43:22]: Were there any others in the last month or two?

Speaker 2 [00:43:30]: No, our conflicts are mainly about my ex. It's about the idea that I'm not exclusively hers. I always say we live in the present and love unconditionally, but it's hard for her to understand. She's made efforts, and we've had other minor conflicts, but those are the main issues.

Speaker 1 [00:44:34]: You mentioned the notion of possession in a couple. Can you elaborate on your thoughts about it?

Speaker 2 [00:44:47]: It's a complicated subject. I believe loving should allow for openness and not possession, but loving deeply also means a bit of possession. Marriage and possession are linked. We joke about marriage, wondering if it's for security or more sex, but it's more about stability. True autonomy in a couple is crucial. Possessing the other should be for fun, not out of need.

Speaker 1 [00:47:24]: Autonomy in oneself and the couple is important for you?

Speaker 2 [00:47:29]: Yes.

Speaker 1 [00:47:32]: You mentioned it earlier. Based on your experiences, what is love for you?

Speaker 2 [00:47:49]: Love, for me, there's the love of a couple. We say love. Love, for me, is the energy, the vital energy; it's the love that makes flowers grow, that brings people into the world, that makes a child grow, protected by their mother. Love is the energy that encompasses everything; it's spiritual, somewhat esoteric. It's the primitive energy, a vibration within us and for us. For me, everything is love. It's [religion], but that's the true love. It's the substance that keeps us alive. On top of that, there's our ego, there's the other, there are layers of many things. And so, if we free ourselves from all that, we are in raw, pure love without any animosity. But we are human beings; we have this duality within us, which is why we need to fully accept it to be ourselves and not hide it. Like being [Religion] and being only good, and if I am bad, I'll go to hell. And it's true that reasoning through love and communicating with love makes us much more understood because there's a sincerity in the approach that is unmatched.

Speaker 1 [00:49:46]: How important would you say love is in a relationship for you?

Speaker 2 [00:50:00]: Well, this kind of love starts with oneself, in the way we respect ourselves in all that we are, and thus, love others. Yes, it has a significant place... You can have relationships without it; it's not necessary. It depends on what kind of relationship you want, whether it's for comfort, stability, purely sexual, for being listened to, or for money. Everyone sees it differently, and the goal is to stay together. But I want a relationship of absolute love today.

Speaker 1 [00:50:55]: You said loving oneself means respecting oneself. Is it also about respecting the other?

Speaker 2 [00:51:02]: I think if we are sincere with the other, we have to respect them. What happened was, I didn't respect her, and she felt disrespected. I apologized a thousand times because I was far from wanting to hurt her. That's why I talked about this story. I hurt her, I didn't respect her, and that goes against the whole idea. If we are sincere with the other, we have to respect them.

Speaker 1 [00:51:38]: You talk about love, and there are many forms of it. How do you know your partner loves you?

Speaker 2 [00:51:57]: I think you don't have to say it. I rarely say it, and she says it more than I do, but that's not how I know. I think we know the other loves us by their attention and intention. When we have generosity and gratitude, we often look at the other, thinking how lucky we are to be together and to share something special. That's a key element, having gratitude, which is worth a thousand "I love you's". Someone who says they are lucky to have you in their life, not because you are perfect, but because you bring so much, and you share so much. That's worth a million "I love you's".

Speaker 1 [00:53:19]: In attention and intention.

Speaker 2 [00:53:22]: Yes. It's quite spontaneous when you love someone unless there are blockages.

Speaker 1 [00:53:33]: Can you tell me about one of the recent positive interactions you had with [partner]?

Speaker 2 [00:53:46]: It was today, sharing about picking blackberries and my fruits growing. It's a great sharing experience, isn't it? It's a positive interaction because it reflects our shared values of nature, autonomy, and picking. Right before that, we had an argument about a vasectomy. She removed her IUD, and we talked about condoms. She got upset, feeling that contraception is always on women. [Redacted]. We get upset, but we work through it.

Speaker 1 [00:56:36]: You mentioned things being erased, talking about intimate or personal matters.

Speaker 2 [00:56:44]: I don't mind; you can keep it.

Speaker 1 [00:56:46]: Everything is anonymized, so nothing can be traced back to you or [partner]. All names are changed, so you can speak freely. Nothing leaves here since I'll be handling the data before anonymization, so you can feel at ease. I'd like to hear about challenges in your relationship.

Speaker 2 [00:57:23]: Challenges, there are always many because I constantly set them, sometimes too many. There's the challenge of distance, being good together, trying new things. If something scares us, I like to face it.

Speaker 1 [00:59:43]: Are there challenges you've already overcome?

Speaker 2 [01:00:15]: For example, she had never flown before, so we went on a vacation by plane. That was a challenge. Sexually, we've set many challenges for the sake of the challenge. I had the challenge of being comfortable in her environment with her close ones. She has many relationships, and I don't have many friends. Writing a song for her was a challenge because it's engaging and daring. Achieving these challenges makes us happy. Without challenges, it becomes routine, which isn't exciting. It's like a thrill ride.

Speaker 1 [01:01:46]: So, challenges are beneficial for your relationship.

Speaker 2 [01:01:53]: I need them, maybe too much, but they're beneficial. They push us, create memories, and see how far we can go. It's like a thrill ride. Some may fear not overcoming challenges or prefer stability. We talked about this recently; maybe one day she'll get tired of my constant need for new things. She says she loves me for who I am.

Speaker 1 [01:03:14]: Living in the present. You mentioned it several times.

Speaker 2 [01:03:18]: Yes, she might have mentioned it too.

Speaker 1 [01:03:21]: What she said interests me, but right now, it's about you.

Speaker 2 [01:03:26]: Living in the present comes from life experiences. I've lost people and gone through tough times, realizing happiness is now, not tomorrow. Since the start of our relationship, she gave me a sign saying I harp on about the present moment. We function that way; it comes up often. For her, the present means protecting her heart because things might end. But for me, it's loving fully in each moment. Any couple that doesn't focus on the present has no guarantee of tomorrow. So, we enjoy today to the fullest.

Speaker 1 [01:04:55]: You mentioned conflicts. How do you resolve them?

Speaker 2 [01:05:05]: By talking, listening, and understanding each other, then explaining and asking for opinions. In conflicts, you can't communicate with emotion. Our recent conflict about a third person, we decided I'd visit her three days later. We talked late at night, laying next to each other, which helped smooth things out. Physical contact is another way to resolve conflicts, especially since distance is tough.

Speaker 1 [01:06:57]: Another way to reconnect?

Speaker 2 [01:07:00]: Yes, touching.

Speaker 1 [01:07:05]: Besides communication, how else do you maintain your relationship?

Speaker 2 [01:07:18]: Everything is about communication, whether gestural, written, or oral. Even cooking together is communication. We often cook together without much verbal communication, making a great meal. The level of expectation and balance in a relationship is crucial. Matching levels of expectation makes it easier.

Speaker 1 [01:08:48]: What could make you leave your partner?

Speaker 2 [01:08:52]: Nothing, unless I want to enrich my experiences and she doesn't. We've agreed on that. But it's not my wish. She might leave because she doesn't want to live that way. I should tell her that nothing would make me leave; she'd be happy.

Speaker 1 [01:09:42]: Would you say this relationship is good for you?

Speaker 2 [01:09:44]: Yes, otherwise it wouldn't exist.

Speaker 1 [01:09:49]: What makes it good for you?

Speaker 2 [01:09:59]: It lets me be myself, it's a bonus. It might sound optional, but it's really a plus. The other is a mirror of us; when they reflect a good image, we make efforts to be better. It's a virtuous circle of support and encouragement, like with a child, boosting our ego.

Speaker 1 [01:11:14]: A good relationship can regulate our functioning, help us manage daily life, emotions, and stabilize us.

Speaker 2 [01:11:37]: Can you rephrase?

Speaker 1 [01:11:40]: A good relationship helps regulate daily functioning, emotions, and provides stability.

Speaker 2 [01:11:51]: Yes, it helps regulate us. In couples, we often say one calms the other. It's the role of a couple to temper or excite the other, finding balance. She has many friends, I don't, so I rely on her for deep relationships. She provides that kind of support.

Speaker 1 [01:13:00]: Can you give an example of when your partner helped you regulate yourself?

Speaker 2 [01:13:10]: Yes, many times when I'm in difficulty at work or with family. She asks questions, allowing me to express myself, which is already half the work.

Speaker 2 [01:13:26]: Are you a [occupation] or what exactly?

Speaker 1 [01:13:32]: We can talk about it after the interview if you'd like. I'm not a [occupation]; I'm a [occupation], which is different.

Speaker 2 [01:13:40]: That's even better!

Speaker 1 [01:13:42]: Not necessarily better, just different.

Speaker 2 [01:13:45]: Yes. When she asks questions, it calms me, sharing my emotions. Giving advice is different; I'm non-judgmental, she is judgmental. When she talks about her ex, I don't take sides because judging isn't constructive. But when she judges, it creates a bond against someone else. Not taking sides can be interesting because it leads to less conflict.

Speaker 1 [01:15:28]: Do you think you are the same person you were before the relationship?

Speaker 2 [01:15:38]: We are never the same person. We evolve if we allow ourselves to understand our mistakes, question ourselves, and be better than yesterday. Failure, especially, leads to growth.

Speaker 1 [01:16:20]: Do you think [partner] has changed in the relationship?

Speaker 2 [01:16:31]: According to her, yes, sincerely.

Speaker 1 [01:16:37]: How has she changed?

Speaker 2 [01:16:41]: She says I've softened her and opened her mind. She's fiery, and I'm about wisdom, patience, non-action. She brings me activity and responsibility. It's a good balance due to chance and a desire to be together.

Speaker 1 [01:17:40]: And how have you changed?

Speaker 2 [01:17:50]: She's made me realize my capacities for management and responsibility, impacting my life, work, and self-image positively. It strengthens and stabilizes me.

Speaker 1 [01:18:34]: Do you feel secure in this relationship?

Speaker 2 [01:18:41]: It's good to feel secure alone, but the relationship should be ideally secure. Yes, I feel secure in this relationship, but it's a bonus, not a need.

Speaker 1 [01:20:06]: Feeling secure can also mean getting comfort in distress. Is this something you relate to? Can you share an experience where this was the case?

Speaker 2 [01:20:37]: Often, when we are apart and have problems, we know we'll be heard and comforted. I'm doing renovations, and I ask [partner] for a lot of advice. Her input is very important as it provides intelligent support.

Speaker 1 [01:21:48]: Earlier, we talked about sexuality being important for you. Are you satisfied with your sex life?

Speaker 2 [01:22:04]: Yes, because I've made an effort individually, and [partner] has allowed that. My happiness depends on me, and I create the conditions for it.

Speaker 1 [01:22:44]: Currently, how often do you have sex?

Speaker 2 [01:22:49]: About every day we see each other, so two or three times a week, sometimes four. We have a very intense sex life.

Speaker 1 [01:23:12]: I'll share my screen with you. There will be two items from a scale.

Speaker 1 [01:23:30]: Generally, my partner really listens to me. On a scale from 1 to 9, where 1 is not at all true, 3 is somewhat true, 5 is moderately true, 7 is very true, and 9 is completely true. Where would you place yourself?

Speaker 2 [01:23:47]: Generally, I'd say 7 or 8.

Speaker 1 [01:23:57]: Seven or eight?

Speaker 2 [01:24:03]: Not exhaustive, as sometimes we don't want to hear each other out, for protection. Does that work for you?

Speaker 1 [01:24:17]: It's not about me; it's about your perspective.

Speaker 2 [01:24:24]: I'd say 8.

Speaker 1 [01:24:30]: Why not 7 then?

Speaker 2 [01:24:36]: Because sometimes she doesn't listen because she isn't ready to hear.

Speaker 1 [01:24:45]: And why not 6?

Speaker 2 [01:24:48]: Because generally, she listens attentively. That's why I hesitated between 7 and 8, but she deserves an 8.

Speaker 1 [01:25:05]: My partner is generally attentive to my needs. On the same scale, where would you rate that?

Speaker 2 [01:25:11]: Eight.

Speaker 1 [01:25:14]: Why not 9?

Speaker 2 [01:25:17]: Because my needs are important, and we strive to meet each other's needs, which is the basis of our relationship. We make a lot of effort to meet each other's needs.

Speaker 1 [01:25:48]: Why not 7?

Speaker 2 [01:25:51]: Because we manage it well.

Speaker 1 [01:25:55]: And why not 9?

Speaker 2 [01:26:01]: Because we're still imperfect.

Speaker 1 [01:26:07]: How satisfied are you with your relationship? Completely unsatisfied, very unsatisfied, somewhat unsatisfied, neutral, somewhat satisfied, very satisfied, or completely satisfied?

Speaker 2 [01:26:24]: Between very satisfied and completely satisfied. There are still things I need to be completely satisfied, but I'm entirely satisfied today.

Speaker 1 [01:26:45]: In numerical terms, on a scale from 0 to 10, where 0 is not at all satisfied and 10 is completely satisfied, where would you place yourself?

Speaker 2 [01:27:00]: Choosing is giving up. But I'd say 9 because it's closer to 10.

Speaker 1 [01:27:19]: Nine because it seems closer?

Speaker 2 [01:27:27]: I'm very satisfied. Not 10 because there are still minor details. Not 8 because it deserves a 9.

Speaker 1 [01:27:41]: We're nearing the end of the interview. Is there anything you'd like to add, clarify, or correct about what we discussed?

Speaker 2 [01:27:57]: No.

Speaker 2 [01:28:52]: No, I don't think so. I had plenty of time to express myself.

Speaker 2 [01:28:55]: I don't think I said anything...

Speaker 1 [01:29:00]: Very well, I'll stop the recording now.
